The Cherished Wife.

There is a blissful relance on the devotion with which a man may inspire his wife, by proper regard to her disposition, and proper respect to her sensibilities, apart from considerations merely affecting her personal condition,-though these, too, should have his care, -that gives to what may be called the fifth act of the drama of wedded life, a holier and happier interest than memory, disposed as die is to gild the past, can find to embellish the scenes in which it is believed by many the torch of Hymen burns brightest. There is a fulness of enjoyment in that entire identity of interests, pursuits and feelings, it is impossible to establish in this sacred co-partnership, to which there comes but one qualifying ingredient-the reflection that it must have an end; an I even this carries a sweet conviction with it in promise beyond the grave; for it is difficult to imagine that he who gives nothing in vain, will permit his choicest blessing-the heart's affectionate action -to perish with the sphere in which it was so delightfully exercised. A contrary opinion is as natural to us as to breathe; as much a part of us as that heart's emotion: as thoroughly engrafted in us as the consciousness of immortality to which it imparts its most precious anticipations. It is the stay of the loiterer on life's scene, when friends, kindred and companions have left him; it forms a portion, and a large portion of his hope in the life to come. It peopled the beautiful Elysium of the Pagan. It prevails, despite his limitations of Divine Goodness, in the breast of the Christian. It makes the Indian's heaven. It is nature's creed. It is, to husband, wife, parent, children and friend, what the words of our blessed Savior were to the sisters of Lazarus, "He sleepeth, but he will rise again,"-not to forget you; not in insensibility to earthly connections; not dead to affections that give a foretaste of heaven on earth-but renewed, not transformed; purified, but unchanged; a creature still, blending with service and adoration of its Maker, the practice and fruition of those less sacred attachments of which it was capable here, and which may only become more constant and more pure hereafter.

Singular Discovery.

There is nothing new under the sun. The American coffin which attracted so much attention at the Great Exhibition of 1851, and which, by producing the vacuum by means of the air-pump, was thought to be an entirely new method of preserving corpses from decay, has been just proved to have been known in the middle ages. While demolishing, a short time ago, the old church of the ancient Welsh College at Helmsted, near Brunswick, a coffin made of lead, the lid of which was of glass of immense thickness, was found, and contained the body of a young girl, apparently about twelve years of age, which still preserved every appearance of youth and freshness, although the coffin bore the date 1461 .-A private letter from a bystander tells us that-', The face and figure of the child were perfect as in life, not a single sign of decay being visible throughout the whole person. The cheek preserved its delicate rose-tint-the forehead its snowy whiteness. The hair, which was of a beautiful gold colour, was parted on the brow, and fell in long ringlets over the bosom, crisp and fresh as though the child had lain down to sleep the moment before. The dress of white satin embroidered in gold flower, the shoes of white velvet, and the lace apron, all seemed bright as if newly purchased; and more astonishing still, the bunch of lilies held in the hand of the corpse still looked as fresh and moist as though the dew still bung upon it. The workmen engaged in the demolition of the building were struck with awe, and immediately went in quest of the chief magistrate of the place, who soon arrived on the spot, accompanied by several of the inhabitants. Unfortunately, the worthy functionary having recently been made the victim of a practical joke in town, and being half suspicious that der bretteren that sisters, who you. Let then become affectionately as we read, if we have never wept before, the same thing was intended, would not believe in the reality and seized a spade from the hand of one of the workmen who stood near, dealt a heavy blow upon the lid of the coffio, and smashed one or two of the diamond-shaped panes of glass of which it was composed.
