It is also a fruitful cause of dyspepsia, because the poisoned secretions as often pass into the stomach as into the lungs.

Not unfrequently there is more or less deafness and usually loss of smell and tarte, and the nostrils become ulcerated from the discharge, and the ulceration becomes so deep and extended that the discharge becomes bloody and fettil, emitting an offensive and sicketsing smell. The ulceration sometimes attacks the spongy bones of the nose and roat of the mouth, and the head becomes almost a massive ulcer; especially when the blood is tainted with scrofula or other diseases.
