This is an age of social reforms, Everywhere they are being inaugu- do so is to neglect a duty very rated and vigorously pressed with plainly taught in Scripture and nasurprising success. One chief cause ture. We recognize the obligation of this quickened activity in social of our churches to society in this reimprovement is the rise of the study gard by our temperance and other of Sociology. The scientific method reform resolutions in every convenof observing social phenomena tion or association.

has furnished the public with the knowledge of the defects of society and the most practical method of remedying them. Every leading university of the North and in Europe has its school of Sociology. The American Journal of Sociolo gy, issued from the press of the Chicago University, a most excellent magazine, has undertaken the task of furnishing the public with the product of this extensive investigation. One regrets that the South is so far behind in this department of learning. Yet bere and there the Southerner wakes up to this new world of information and becomes a devotee to this most useful branch of study. Social reformers will increase with the extension of the study of Sociology. But our present purpose is to in quire about the functions of preacher in these social reforms Nearly every science originated with the teachers of religion. Polit ical economy, and most other now purely secular sciences, were first taught from a chair of Theology. What wonder that the old mother should still foster her latest off spring, even though its weaning time may have come? But the pul pit can never divorce itself from Sociology. Society is the organism in which the people to whom we preach live and act. They are the atoms that make up the social mass and the sources of its energies and life. So long, therefore, as we work upon men we will of necessity affect society. Hence the pulpit must ever be a social factor. By working a change in the individuals, we indirectly determine the condition of the social organism. Every one will admit that this is a province of the preacher in society. But is it his duty to address himself to society in its corporate capacity and affect the individual through the organism? I am persuaded that it is, from several considerations :

r. Much of the Bible, which is the substance of his message as a preacher, is addressed to society in its corporate capacity. Especially is this true of the Old Testament, which is pre-eminently a sociological literature. Its law and prophesies are almost entirely social. It is addressed to Israel, Judah, Jerusalem, Assyria, &c , societies of men. Take for example the prophesies of Isaiah, which are almost entirely directed to social reforms, and are politico-religious stump speeches. He has no gospel for the individual in the first half of his prophecies, but is a social reformer unmercifully scathing the social evils of his country, such as intempreacher is to avoid social reforms, he must seal his lips to half of the word of God in the Old Testament. I venture the suggestion that any preacher faithfully expounding the prophesies of Isaiah alone from Sunday to Sunday will create a social reform in his community, that is, if he has any power to make his hearers appreciate the meaning of his texts, But most of the New Testament tians, and treats of their relations to each other and in society.
